

29 AUG

Establishing healthy parent-teacher relationships for early learning success

Bringing Research to Real-Life

By Susan M. Sheridan, Ph.D.

Principal Investigator, Early Learning Network Lead

Director, Nebraska Center for Research on Children, Youth, Families & Schools, University of Nebraska-Lincoln

It's inevitable. Labor Day marks the transition between two seasons: the end of summer and the back-to-school season. The beginning of a new school year brings new teachers, new classmates, new opportunities and new relationships.

While the relationships your child forms with peers are important, you may be surprised that the most significant relationship, in terms of your child's school success and development, is the one you form with his or her teacher.

Your relationship with your child's teacher can be an important factor